Contents definition: Medical, clinical and pharmaceutical biochemistry is a core field of medical, pharmaceutical and veterinary studies and they know about the processes taking place in living organisms. It is a modern and constantly evolving interdisciplinary field, which clarifies the mechanisms of biological processes and their regulation at the molecular level, and thus forms the basis for the possibilities of influencing them, especially pharmacological. At the same time, it creates preconditions for monitoring the physiological and pathological state of the organism. A special area in medical, clinical and pharmaceutical biochemistry is the interaction of drugs with specific enzyme systems involved in the action and biotransformation of drugs, at the level of cells and subcellular structures. Knowledge of biochemistry and their applications in the field of preclinical and clinical medicine as well as pharmacy are currently a very rapidly developing part of the natural sciences. The development of this field is very closely connected with the sectors that are in the primary sphere of interest of scientific and technical development of modern society, such as healthcare, pharmaceutical industry, development of new drugs, nutrition and biotechnology.
